Résumé de la conférence :
The talk provides an overview, how a slow response developed into an effective and integrated Global HIV Response. How some challenges were overcome, which challenges remain and the impact of the Response on the development of Global Health. The development and implementation of integrated interventions addressing biomedical, behavioural and structural factors have been responsible for most of the successes that have been achieved, largely due to the inclusion of those populations that have been most affected by the Pandemic. Recognizing that access to high quality and affordable preventive and therapeutic interventions is a human right, including for those populations that in many societies are marginalized, is a fundamental necessity to make a successful transition from an emergency to a sustainable response as recognized by the Sustainable Development Goals.

Objectifs d’apprentissage :
- Be able to learn to achieve successes and overcome challenges based on the experience obtained and learned through the Global HIV Response.
- Be aware of and able to anticipate the various stages of dealing with epidemics and pandemics and how they eventually might move from emergency to sustainable responses.
- Recognize the utility of the Ecological Model of Disease Causation to identify the causation of disease and being able to use this framework to develop and implement appropriate interventions, linking and integrating vertical programmes with horizontal services as part of moving from an emergency to a sustainable response.
